Real Honest Boxing Called For in American Training Camps

AGGRESSIVE ATTACK LIKED

War Department Commission Dis-courages Backstepping and Defensive Tactics

AMERICA. June 27. - Real boxing matches, but the kind where one boxer and then the other stands back and waits for his opponent to do the leading and fighting while he stands back on the defensive, are the kind wanted in the Army training camps.

It is this kind of boxing that will aid the boxers in their real warfare, and the War Department's Commission in charge of camp activities has promulgated new boxing rules, putting a premium on aggressive attack as against defense and discouraging backstepping, covering up and other purely defensive tactics.

The time limit of the rounds for novices has been set at two minutes to encourage fast work, with four rounds as the standard except in divisional championships, when six rounds are authorized.

Wolgast-Lewis Styles Banned
The new rules have been adopted to do away with the famous Wolgast style of cover up or the Ted Lewis style of tap and run away.

Wolgast and his imitators frequently went through an entire round without landing more than one or two blows, always writing for the other fellow to do the leading.

Ted Lewis's style is to dance around his man, occasionally send in a light tap and then dance away again.

This kind of boxing hardly benefits a soldier in his military training, and it is for this reason that the Army desires to eliminate it from the camp bouts. Real boxing, however, has proved a big aid in camp training.
